Q: Is it possible to access the "Process" model, outside of django.contrib.auth.models? I am in the process of writing an app that uses an external API. The idea is that I'd like to pull in a variety of data in the form of dictionaries, and work with them programmatically in Python. What I'm working with currently is django.contrib.auth.models.User, which is incredibly powerful but also cumbersome and can be limited if I want to use it programmatically. For instance, setting the user's password doesn't directly set the encrypted_password value in the user's record. So, every time I access an object, I need to go through all of its fields and set them to the value of their corresponding objects (as in something like self.user.encrypted_password = self.user.password) What I'd like to do instead is be able to access the process module, since it already does that kind of functionality and is populated with much of what I need. I'm thinking that'd be the more direct route to getting what I need done. I figured, if it's in there, I can use the same pattern of using self.process.object_name and it would populate the values in the structure. I've tried to do this with no luck. Is it possible? Here is the model where I am trying to access the process object: class Goal(models.Model): type = models.ForeignKey(GoalType) goal_id = models.CharField(max_length=255) goal_description = models.TextField() def __unicode__(self): return "%s" % self.goal_description A: It is not possible to get a normal user instance using the ProcessModel, but you can use the process_user() method on the UserModel. In my case, I need to use the ProcessModel to filter all instances of the ProcessModel that have an active associated instance of the UserModel. I can do this by simply stating: from django.contrib.auth.models import User as AuthUser ... PROCESS_USER = AuthUser() PROCESS_USER.process_user = self.user This makes it so that I

Why the Hack Attack on Sallie Mae? It's More Than Just Easy Lending Let's face it: Life is hard. You know, that sometimes life doesn't go according to plan. Between the cost of living, paying the bills and making sure your family is taken care of, life can sometimes feel out of control. Whether you're a student in college or recently graduated, or you're a seasoned work-a-day person, the idea of being laid off, being forced to take low-paying jobs or not being able to pay your bills can be a constant sense of fear in the back of your mind. If you're having a hard time meeting the financial burden of college or being stumped by unexpected financial worries, learning how to become self-sufficient may be the answer to your prayers. A recent Sallie Mae hack that saw up to 1 million users' data stolen is a perfect example of how life in today's world isn't always as easy and hard as it seems. Not only is this hack an example of financial hardship and hardships outside of the home, but hackers have proven to be the be the main creators of debt for college and school-age children through the use of federal and state student loan programs. So, what can students do to protect themselves from such sudden financial trouble? First, look into the various student loan programs out there that are sponsored by the government. The best advice is to look into various types of "income-driven repayment plans," and understand each one of them. But, it's also important to look into private student loans and programs. And there's no better example of why I say that than with the hack from Sallie Mae. This isn't just an example of financial hardship — this is the latest in a series of hacks against private student loan companies. First, Sallie Mae experienced a break-in that saw the cybercriminals steal up to 1 million accounts. After that, the company announced it would only be able to provide 682,000 social security numbers to an Alabama county. And, just hours after that announcement, several individuals claimed to have received calls from Sallie Mae claiming their income data had been stolen. It's unfortunate that Sallie Mae is under the spotlight,
